Papillary thyroid carcinoma (PTC) accounts for >95% of thyroid carcinomas. Recent advances in pathogenetic studies have shown that the BRAF mutation, which was initially found in thyroid cancers, has a role in both the genesis of thyroid cancer and its progression. The BRAF mutation is associated with follicular variant of PTC (FV-PTC), and the BRAF mutation has been shown to be in part responsible for the aggressive clinical behavior of FV-PTC. The I-131 avidity in PTC has been shown to be helpful in differentiating PTC from benign adenomatous goiter or indeterminate nodules. It is now a challenge to find out the optimal treatment strategy in patients with PTC based on the current best data.Men who masturbate regularly are more physically capable of having intercourse, says a new study. Researchers at the University of Calgary and Queen's University in Ontario, Canada, found that men who reported masturbating regularly were more likely than those who did not to have had sexual intercourse in the last six months. And while the researchers weren't able to say exactly why regular masturbation might lead to more success with the ladies, they said there were some "interesting" parallels to the relationship between smoking cigarettes and lung cancer. "There's been a lot of research showing that there are relationships between smoking and other negative health outcomes," said Tessa Barnes-Holmes, lead author of the study, which was published in the journal Men's Health. Story continues below advertisement "But we also know that in certain populations, in certain populations and for specific health outcomes, there are positive links between smoking and something like sexual activity, or aggressive sexual activity." In this particular study, the researchers surveyed 1,600 Canadian men about their sex lives and, among other things, asked them how often they masturbated. The results showed that those who reported masturbating three or more times per week had an increased likelihood of having had sex in the past six months. Results were similar for masturbation and sexual activity in the previous year,
