Novel targets for the treatment of cancer, autoimmune diseases, inflammatory disorders, and metabolic disorders. Despite the long history of medicinal chemistry, in the last 25 years, innovative chemical entities have been successfully introduced in clinics to treat a wide variety of disorders. This review attempts to summarize the most recent findings of active compounds, drug candidates, and drug leads in this field. In this context, the main attention was focused on recent advances in the development of inhibitors targeting proteins with an impact on the immune system, as well as on pro-inflammatory mediators, or/and mediators with an impact on cancer chemoresistance and tumorigenesis. Factors affecting hospital bed utilization in patients with heart failure: a study from Spain. To evaluate hospital utilization of patients with heart failure in Spain, and analyse differences between patients according to the severity and types of heart failure. A population-based, cross-sectional, observational study of 3968 patients diagnosed with heart failure in Spain between 2007 and 2012 from the Minimum Basic Data Set. The rates of inpatient admissions for patients with heart failure were analysed according to the clinical features of the patient, the type of admission (emergency or elective), and the hospital's level of care. The median length of hospitalization was 7 days, ranging from 3 to 30 days. Patients with more severe heart failure were more likely to be admitted to high-level hospitals, and patients with coronary heart disease (CHD) were more likely to be admitted to secondary or tertiary hospitals. The overall mean of hospital stay was 8 days. Patients with a shorter disease duration had a higher likelihood of being admitted to a tertiary hospital. The probability of discharge at home was 90.4%. We observed a significant increase in the number of patients with heart failure hospitalized annually in Spain. These data highlight the need to improve the efficiency of heart failure care.
